Takht-e-Babri: The Ambitious Badshah's First Foothold

Carved into the Salt Range, this stark stone throne marks where the restless Emperor Babur halted his army, dictating his memoirs and claiming his first imperial foothold in the subcontinent.

The Dulmial Cannon: A Testament to Empire & Forgotten Loyalty

An iron relic transported by ox-cart to this village, the cannon testifies to the over 460 local men who marched from Dulmial to serve and die in Europe's distant, imperial war - the largest contribution from any single village in South Asia. Moreover, this region produced Sepoy Khudadad Khan, the first soldier from undivided India to receive the Victoria Cross in WWI. We will also visit a small museum in the village set up by veterans.

Katas Raj Temples: The Sacred Tears of Shiva and the Pandava Refuge

Built around a holy pool, mythically formed from the weeping of Lord Shiva mourning his consort Sati, this stunning complex includes various Hindu temples. It is said to be the very spot where the Pandava brothers spent part of their thirteen-year exile described in the Mahabharata, a place where spirituality and the deepest narratives of faith converge.

Malkana Temples: The Ruined Echoes of the Hindu Shahi

These exquisitely carved, now-abandoned structures are the silent, sublime relics of the Hindu Shahi era over one thousand years ago. Overgrown and neglected, they are a melancholic, profound testament to the region's long, lost history of religious pluralism and architectural skill.

Chakwal Canyons: Geological Cross-Section

These dramatic landscapes reflect the fascinating geological cross-section of the Salt Range. Carved by wind and water erosion from Tertiary-era sedimentary rock, the canyons display layers of rust-coloured silt and clay. They represent the transformed floor of a primeval sea, revealing the raw, austere forces that sculpted this magnificent wilderness.
